The Patterns That Shape Life
Sky Nelson-Isaacs, Physicist

"Are Seemingly Random and Simple Twists of Fate Related to Greater Patterns Unfolding Across Time?"

What if the events of life — missed chances, unexpected twists, and perfect opportunities — aren't random at all but part of a larger pattern unfolding across time? Sky will explore how small actions ripple inward and outward, shaping both our personal paths and our collective conversations. He will examine how context reshapes meaning, how patterns connect us, and how curiosity and self-awareness can act as aids for navigating polarized times. The presentation is based on the intersection of physics, life, and the unseen threads that hold it all together.

As physicist, educator, author, and musician his research into theoretical quantum physics and the nature of time has been published in several academic journals. With a master's degree and teaching credential in physics, Sky is a high school physics teacher passionate about innovation and equity in the teaching of STEM (Science, Technology, Engineering, Mathematics). Sky teaches in the East Bay and is a former long-time resident of Santa Rosa, California.
